The New Zealand Intelligence and Security Bill 2016

FACTSHEET NO. 14

What the Bill proposes

- Making it clear that sharing information with other countries must be in accordance with New Zealand law and human rights obligations and in accordance with the overall purpose of the Bill – ‘to secure New Zealand as a free, open and democratic society’.
- Greater coordination and oversight of the New Zealand Security Intelligence Service (NZSIS) and the Government Communications Security Bureau (GCSB) international intelligence sharing and cooperation arrangements.

Why have international partners?

The global nature of modern security threats means that countries must work together to share and act on intelligence to keep their populations safe.

International partners help New Zealand by providing information, knowledge, technology, skills and expertise. This includes providing a far greater understanding of international events that relate to our security and wellbeing than we could acquire alone.

Who are New Zealand’s intelligence partners?

New Zealand’s strongest and most well-known intelligence relationship is the “Five Eyes” partnership, with the United Kingdom, Australia, the United States and Canada. The alliance goes back to the 1940s and extends to areas such as border security and defence.

New Zealand also shares intelligence with a range of other countries and international organisations on both a formal and ad-hoc basis. The level of cooperation with other countries differs depending on common interests.

Arrangements consistent with New Zealand law

- The Directors-General of NZSIS and GCSB must take all reasonable steps to ensure that cooperation with foreign partners is in accordance with New Zealand law and all human rights obligations.
- Before authorising the sharing of intelligence with a foreign partner, the Minister must be satisfied that the relevant agency will be acting in accordance with New Zealand law and all human rights obligations.

Improving coordination and oversight

The Bill also proposes greater coordination and oversight of NZSIS and GCSB’s international intelligence sharing and cooperation arrangements.

The Minister must issue a Ministerial Policy Statement to provide detailed guidance to the NZSIS and GCSB in relation to:

- cooperating with a foreign partner;
- providing advice and assistance to a foreign partner; and
- sharing intelligence with a foreign partner.

The Bill also requires the Inspector-General of Intelligence and Security be consulted on all Ministerial Policy Statements relating to foreign partners.

Outside of the Bill, Cabinet has agreed that any new intelligence relationships require consultation with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Trade. Cabinet has also decided that Parliament’s Intelligence and Security Committee be briefed on any new intelligence relationships for its information.
